Fortunate Occurrence

It was a stormy evening. The sun had set in a bank of clouds and a stiff breeze was blowing, driving at times before it gusts of fine sleet and rain. It was altogether dirty weather, to use a nautical expression. But it ans not the state of the sea or sky which was making Jack Burton look so gloomy as he paced the deck of a large yacht homeward and from a pleasure cruise to Norway. He was trying to make up his mind to some-

"Gone down below, I saw her there," an-

Away flew Jack in search of his lady love. He found her in the saloon.
"I came to get this," she said, pointing to a box in her hand. "It is not mine," she continued, "and I promised faithfully to give it safely to the rightful owner."

"Even at the risk of your life;" queried Jack, "but come quickly." He picked up a large cloak as he spoke and wrapped it round the trembling girl,

R. HARRIS & CO., Seventh and D,

Will Furnish You One at a Special Price, Hark! What is that? A sound of oars, "A boat, a boat, along there, Hurrah, hurrah," Jack's rapturous cheer was answered. They were saved saved.

Two hours later a very quaint-looking couple clad in heterogeneous articles borrowed from the fisherfolk's wardrobe, were seated before the roaring fire burning in honor of the shipwrocked guests.

"Poor souls, lost everything, it is terrible," remarked the housewife to the gossips at her door, but they did not appear to be in need of her pity, for Paisy's face beamed with happiness and Jack did not lock altogether broken "I do not believe I should ever have plucked up courage to have asked you under ordinary circumstances," he said, as he gave her the hundredth kiss. "Your money...." "If you had I should have refused you," interrupted Daisy, "I should have thought you were after it, not mee but now," with a winsome smile, "I know better, my Jack. I think," coquettishly, "that for us the ableweek has been a fortunate occurrence,"— as the fair lips were raised to his he heard her low, rapturous answer: "Your sweet-heart forever and ever." Chicago News.

A Home-made Oriental Lounge.

I saw a very pretty and inexpensive lounge

the other day made out of a common woven wire cot. The legs had been cut down until it stood about a foot and a half from the ground.

The springs had been covered with two heavy old comforts, and over all a pretty chenille sover—it might have been a portierre for all over-it might have seen a portierre for all I know-was thrown. A number of nice, large feather pillows, covered, some of them with slikolene, some with the genuine article, gave to the whole thing a decidedly oriental air, and yet I am sure, with a little ingebrushing her hair. Hers was a sweet girlish face, and little wonder its owner had taken captive the heart of honest, penniless Jack "Does he love me; dare I trust him?" she "Does he love me: dare I trust him?" she questioned, and then the tears welled up into the pretty blue eyes. Dalsy was diffident of her own charms and lived in a perpetual dread of being married for her money. She was so very, very rich and had been from childhood daily warned against becoming a grey to fortune-seekers.

prey to fortune-seekers.

Her sad meditations were disturbed by a sudden terrile shock, which caused the ship to strain and quiver through every timber. She hastened on deck only to find her worst fears realized. The yacht had struck on a rock and was filling fast. The saliors were busy lowering boats and the greatest confusion prevailed, to which the acreams of the frightened women and children added consideration. The scene baffled description. When Jack was at last able to have his selfimposed duties at the pumps he found every
